Italy Is Dropping Its Test Requirement

Another country is cutting down on travel requirements.

Italy, which has long been one of the top international destinations for North American travelers, will no longer require those who are fully vaccinated to show a negative COVID-19 test in order to enter the country.

Instead, international travelers will simply have to show that they have been fully vaccinated within nine months of their arrival, or have received a booster shot should their final dose be outside of that nine-month period.

Those who are not fully vaccinated can still show a negative rapid test taken within 48 hours of arrival in order to enter freely without quarantine.

All travelers will still have to fill out the EU Digital Passenger Locator Form (PLF) prior to entering the country (domestic flights within Italy do not need the PLF).

Both locals and tourists are still required to get a digital super green pass, which will allow them to enter hotels, restaurants, and public transportation. Proof of vaccination or proof of recovery from COVID is required for that.

With the move, Italy is joining a growing list of other countries that have made it easier for international travelers to visit, including Israel, Canada, Jamaica, and more.

Italy, which has been on the CDC's Level 4 Advisory List because of its COVID cases, was the top international destination for 2021 according to the United States Tour Operator Association (USTOA). Italy was followed by France/Greece (tied 2nd), and Ireland, a clean sweep for Europe for the third year in a row.

Ireland Drops All Remaining COVID-19 Travel Restrictions

International travel to the Emerald Isle is officially back to normal.

Ireland this week dropped the last remaining COVID-19-era rules for inbound international visitors. Now, travelers heading into Ireland will no longer have to present proof of vaccination or recovery or fill out the country's Passenger Locator Form prior to departure.

Ireland's Minister for Health Stephen Donnelly made the announcement this week, writing that he signed for the removal of the regulations, the "last remaining" COVID-19 travel rules, and called it "another step forward in our COVID efforts."

The news is good news for travelers anxious to return to Ireland without restriction—the country has long been one of the top destinations for international travel from North America, along with Italy, which dropped its COVID-19-era restrictions last week, and France and Greece.

The country is still one of several in the top warning list from the Centers for Disease Control and Prevention (CDC) because of current infection levels (all countries in the Level 4 list have recorded more than 500 COVID-19 cases per 100,000 residents in the past 28 days).

That Level 4 list now includes more than half of all countries that the CDC tracks, including the most recent additions in Hong Kong, New Zealand, and Thailand.
